How a Soldier for a Distant Part Suffer

LINCOLN The MAN of MERCY

The Tender Heart that Was Always Moved by Distress

ONE of the old-fashioned, mad-west stage coaches was rousing from its side over the ordinary bridge that spanned a wide slough when one of its two passengers, Abraham Lincoln, sat in the driver's seat.

"Do you stop a minute?"

"I bin, of the other fellow don't object," was the driver's reply.

"No objection," called the other "feller," Colonel E. D. Baker, who perched at Baker's side during the Civil War.

The coach stopped. Mr. Lincoln stepped out and ran back to the slough. There he lifted out a number of little pigs, while the driver, who had been furling himself in terror over their danger of drowning, ran to them as though as ever human mother did to her rescued offspring. Lincoln returned to the coach, and the journey proceeded.

"Now, Ab," demanded Colonel Baker, "you've been staying over your owned horses' usefulness for the last half hour, and you've been trying to convince me that humanity knows no exception to the rule of selfishness. If there does your selfishness come in, on that dirty little job of charity?"

"Why, your selfishness, the disposition Lincoln," that man was the very essence of selfishness. I couldn't have had any piece of stuff like that on me and left that old son in misery about my pig. Can't you see it did it to you, too, you man?"

A Europe Viewed in History - Published in France and Germany

He had a face that looked like that of Lincoln, but he was not Lincoln. He was a man of a different type, a man of a different mind. He was a man of a different heart. He was a man of a different soul. He was a man of a different spirit. He was a man of a different faith. He was a man of a different hope. He was a man of a different love. He was a man of a different mercy.

He was a man of a different heart. He was a man of a different soul. He was a man of a different spirit. He was a man of a different faith. He was a man of a different hope. He was a man of a different love. He was a man of a different mercy.

NEEDED NO INFLUENCE

He did not need the public's sympathy, while the commonest soldier's own merit to do the work he was in to do. He was a man of a different heart. He was a man of a different soul. He was a man of a different spirit. He was a man of a different faith. He was a man of a different hope. He was a man of a different love. He was a man of a different mercy.

The Heart for Dances - A heart published in 1861

"We were all to read good boys," read the text. It was a heart for dances, a heart for a different kind of love. It was a heart for a different kind of mercy. It was a heart for a different kind of hope. It was a heart for a different kind of faith. It was a heart for a different kind of love. It was a heart for a different kind of mercy.

"I have not the time to be the philosopher of the hour," he said. He was a man of a different heart. He was a man of a different soul. He was a man of a different spirit. He was a man of a different faith. He was a man of a different hope. He was a man of a different love. He was a man of a different mercy.

COMFORTED A DYING BOY

The child in the white hospital coat as he lay on the bed, his face pale and his eyes closed. He was a man of a different heart. He was a man of a different soul. He was a man of a different spirit. He was a man of a different faith. He was a man of a different hope. He was a man of a different love. He was a man of a different mercy.

Lincoln's Plea for Universal Charity His Second Inaugural Address

IN THE opinion of many persons, President Lincoln's second inaugural address deserves to rank almost with the famous Gettysburg address.

An example of better use of the English language, of broader thought, of a purer diction and loftiness than has hitherto accompanied the public utterances of any man of war.

"F"URTHERMORE, it is a plea for universal charity, a plea for a different kind of love. It is a plea for a different kind of mercy. It is a plea for a different kind of hope. It is a plea for a different kind of faith. It is a plea for a different kind of love. It is a plea for a different kind of mercy.

He was a man of a different heart. He was a man of a different soul. He was a man of a different spirit. He was a man of a different faith. He was a man of a different hope. He was a man of a different love. He was a man of a different mercy.

Securing a Parole for Her Brother

She had a face that looked like that of Lincoln, but she was not Lincoln. She was a woman of a different type, a woman of a different mind. She was a woman of a different heart. She was a woman of a different soul. She was a woman of a different spirit. She was a woman of a different faith. She was a woman of a different hope. She was a woman of a different love. She was a woman of a different mercy.

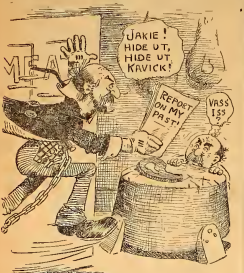

SAVED BY A BABY'S CRY

For there he was the man in the white coat, the man in the white coat. He was a man of a different heart. He was a man of a different soul. He was a man of a different spirit. He was a man of a different faith. He was a man of a different hope. He was a man of a different love. He was a man of a different mercy.

How The University-Trained Negro Has Advanced in the Great Professions.

MARKHARDT. NEGRO PROFESSIONAL MEN IN THE CITY.

By Dr. A. G. GARRETT.

ONLY four or five years have passed since the close of that great struggle which the colored people of this country waged for the advancement of the negro race. The result has been a new era of progress. The negro has made his mark in the world. He has shown his ability to do as well as the white man. He has shown his ability to do as well as the white man. He has shown his ability to do as well as the white man.

Dr. A. G. GARRETT, a prominent educator and writer, discusses the progress of the Negro in various professions. He mentions the work of Dr. J. M. Trotter, a prominent physician, and Dr. J. M.
